Frederick M. Kraut, National Director of the National Organizations Department of the Antithe joint meeting of the B'nai B'rith Lodge and Chapter on Wednesday evening, at 8:00 p. m.

He combined this with voluntary work in such social agencies as the Jewish Community House and the Stuyvesant Neighborhood House.

A well traveled man throughout North America, Mr. Kraut in July, 1943 joined the American Red Cross staff, and after three months as Director of the A.R.C.'s recreational program in New York City, during which time he was active with the American Theatre Wing and a host at the New York Stage Door Canteen, he embarked for Australia.

He remained "Down Under" until February 1945, as Area Director of Recreation and Entertainment for the American Red Cross. Among his responsibilities were (Continued on Page 3)

AMERICAN JEWRY TO DISCUSS EDUCATION FOR CHILDREN

By JUDAH PILCH

Executive Director American Association for Jewish Education

For the second time in the history of the American Jewish community, delegates from all corners of the country and from all aspects and groupings in Jewish life will gather at a national conference, in March 1954, to discuss not fund-raising and philanthropy, not emergencies and responsibilities overseas, not even the frequently raised spectre of anti-Semitism, but Jewish education.

Conferences, national or local, are far from unusual in American Jewish life. But the plain historic fact is that we, American Jews, have lived almost 300 years in these United States and have come together only once on a full-scale, nationally representative basis, to discuss and to plan the future of our existence in terms of the indispensable activity of educating our children to the heritage of Judaism and Jewish living. That such a conference is being held for the second time during the Tercentenary of Jewish life in America is a welcome sign of American Jewry's mature realization that its future rests on education.

The Jews of America are thus facing up to the needs of strengthening their foundations for an ever growing and developing communal life. These needs are more than hypothetical; they are voiced with increasing frequency and urgency wherever thoughtful Jews come together, in local communities and in national organizations, and they are reflected in statement after statement emanating from the leadership of organizations of all types, from the American Jewish Committee to the Zionist Organization; orthodox, conservative, and reform. For the first time in our history, there is really widespread questioning about Jewish education, and the course that it should take.

Involved in this questioning is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the present status of Jewish education. Parents, teachers, social workers, rabbis, and community leaders were increasingly critical of all aspects of the work of Jewish schools. Some attack the day schools as parochial, others condemn the Sunday and afternoon schools as pitifully inadequate. There is sharp comment from some quarters on religious emphasis which, it is said, are unsuitable for the growing generation: others decry what they see as de-Judaization of the schools and the children. Attendance, texts, teachers, facilities, budgets-all come in for criticism and questioning. Then, too, the entire question of the specific aims of Jewish education come to the fore. Should the school be Hebrew language oriented, with adequate provision for the teaching of religious values and practices, or should the school emphasize preparation for life, which would imply the gradual elimination of Hebrew as the sine-qua-non of a sound curriculum and the substitution of subjects and activities that are "functional" in American Jewish life? Should the stress be on knowledge for its own sake or for adjustment in the American Jewish environment? Increasingly, it becomes obvious that these questions have to be balanced against each other and against the Shari and her talking dummies.

facts. The liabilities in American Jewish education should be separated from the assets, the former discarded and the latter enhanced. And the whole existing structure should be measured against the responsibilities of American Jewry in the middle of the twentieth century, responsibilities to itself, to its children, and to Jewish life throughout the world.

The Conference is bound to awaken a new, deeper and broader understanding and interest in Jewish education in every hamlet and metropolis in America where Jews live. These will be reflected not only in greater attendance figures but also in vastly improved educational program. And what is equally important, this new ferment and activity will result in a new wave of support for Jewish education as the key to Jewish survival in the United States.

Shari, the talented radio and TV ventriloquist, will entertain our children on Tuesday, February 23, at 2:30 p.m.

Shari, who in private life is the daughter of Dr. A. Hurwitz, Director of Recreation at Yeshiva University, has appeared on such TV shows as "The Show Goes On," "Candy Carnival" and "Super Circus."

All children are invited to attend this show and have fun with Shari and her talking dummies.
